DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This once-fine cross-gabled farmhouse is in a sad state of disrepair. It stands in the crook of "The Elbow," a steep mountain near the Savage River State Forest. The two-story frame building includes a one-story rear kitchen. A small coal shed stands west of the south-facing house. A spring appears west of the house.

The three-bay house features an arched window in either gable end and in the central cross-gable, and a central entrance comprising sidelights and a transom.

The two-bay-deep building is lit by plain 2/2 windows. An entrance appears on either side of the kitchen. Brick stove-flue chimneys heat each of the three gable ends. The ground slopes to the south, exposing the south side of the stone cellar, now inhabited by cows.

A hip-roofed porch once covered the facade. A quirk-ogee with astragal drip molding tops the window head. Four-panel doors, painted red with grey panels, lead into the house.

Corrugated sheet-metal covers the roof. German siding applied with wire nails sheathes the house.
